___56___ Before the war, workers used to smear their hats with coal tar for protection of their head. Imagine you are about to catch a train from Kaohsiung to Taipei. You rush to the station, but in your haste you forget to eat something. Thankfully, you won't starve. That's because you can buy a bian dang!

"Bian dang" originally meant "convenient" in Mandarin but later adopted the same meaning as the Japanese word "bento." In Japan, bentos are used for take-out boxed meals. They come with dividers to keep different food items separate. When the Japanese first developed Taiwan's train system, locals began selling Japanese-style bentos to passengers on train platforms. Even after the Japanese left, this habit remained and grew increasingly popular. In 1960, the Taiwan Railways Administration even started its own bento service, selling the boxes in train stations and right on trains.

Today, the TRA sells ten million bentos per year, not to mention the millions that are sold by private vendors around stations. A typical Taiwanese bento box comes with pork, tofu, greens, egg, pickled vegetables, and fish, all served on rice. The Taiwanese grew to love them so much that they are now sold everywhere, not just in train stations. Companies even have them delivered to their offices to feed workers at lunch.

When you dig into a bian dang on the train, you are eating a little piece of Taiwan's history. Enjoy every bite!

Morgan's Wonderland, located in San Antonio, Texas, is a theme park geared mainly toward mentally or physically disabled children. The park was built by Gordon Hartman, a former real estate developer. The creation of the park was inspired by his daughter, Morgan, who suffers from severe cognitive delay and physical challenges.

In June 2017, Morgan's Wonderland celebrated the opening of Morgan's Inspiration Island. The new expansion is composed of five themed splash pads and a River Boat Adventure Ride. The wheelchair guests can transfer out of their chairs into unique, waterproof chairs and enjoy the splash park without risking damage to their personal wheelchairs.

Nearly two decades since the dawn of social media, it has no doubt become a mainstream tactic of advertising, yet it is hard to put down the impact in exact dollar terms. Still, it is here to stay, and there are plenty of principles that assist us in telling what social media campaigns work and what don't.

Brands may take misguided steps in promoting on social media by overlooking the fact that social media has altered customers' expectations of how brands might or should communicate with them. Failure to offer timely or immediate response to complaints is likely to be disastrous. Also, it's not advisable to tack one's products to an unrelated event or occasion. Once a brand decides to promote on social media, unlike traditional TV commercials or newspaper ads, it surrenders a significant part of control to the public, granting them the means to respond and comment publicly, including airing their grievances. Brands may feel daunted by the prospect of customers' harsh criticism, constructive or unfounded, on the social space. However, for companies harboring such reservations, perhaps their greater priority lies more in addressing their core image issues than in reaching out to the social media public.

Successful advertising campaigns, on the other hand, know how to engage potential customers socially on the platform. Instead of trying to collect as many "Likes" as possible, brands holding authentic conversations with people stand a better chance of appealing to current or would-be customers. Brands can invite people to share ideas that help craft or shape future products, or provide incentives for customers to recommend the products by sharing why they chose them in the first place. Last, messages must be tailored in order to speak to the target customers on different platforms, which requires some study beforehand. A company can expect to face different audiences on Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, and so on.

For companies wishing to make it big on the social media, knowing the do's and don'ts will make all the difference.

64. How does the author organize this passage?
- (A) A situation → conflicting opinions → a call to action.
 - (B) An introduction → current problems → possible solutions.
 - (C) An introduction → various guidelines → a conclusion.
 - (D) A situation → examples of success → an invitation for discussion.
65. Which of the following companies makes a mistake according to the passage?
- (A) A company conducting research on those to whom they aim to sell their products.
 - (B) A company hiring assistants to handle customer feedback on social media websites.
 - (C) A company selling sweets and chocolate releasing advertisements for Valentine's Day.
 - (D) A company placing repetitive advertisements regardless of the websites or platforms.
66. What can be inferred from the passage?
- (A) More and more brands will prefer to advertise their products on social media because it is more effective than other means.
 - (B) While brands promote their products on TV or in newspaper, not the social media, brands are in charge of everything instead of customers.

- (C) Celebrity endorsements will make a great difference in how brands reach out to their customers.
 (D) Companies had better promote their products or services on social media before improving their general image.

67. What is the author's attitude toward social media marketing?

- (A) Neutral and unbiased.
 (B) Cautiously optimistic.
 (C) Critical and doubtful.
 (D) Positively encouraging.

Edward Snowden has earned his reputation as an NSA whistleblower, who revealed information about the PRISM program. Interviewed by Glenn Greenwald, a reporter and editor, Snowden talked about his motive for whistleblowing. The following is a part of the interview.

Glenn Greenwald: What jobs have you taken on in relation to intelligence?

Edward Snowden: I was once a systems engineer and administrator, and later became a senior consultant for the Central Intelligence Agency. I also dealt with telecommunication information and solutions. And previously I was an infrastructure analyst in an NSA branch office, working under Booz Allen Hamilton.

Glenn Greenwald: When was the key moment that you moved from thinking about becoming a whistleblower to really playing the role of a whistleblower?

Edward Snowden: The amount of information you can have access to is far beyond imagination if you are in such an important position as a systems administrator in an intelligence institution. With this seemingly-powerful privilege, things looking strange, confusing or disturbing pop up right in front you once in a while even when you don't dig into them on purpose. When you actually see enough, you'll come to the conclusion that some of them are seriously wrong. And when you are frustrated to find that people around you do not take you or your words seriously, you'll know it's time to take further action.

Glenn Greenwald: Most people who reveal information or intelligence would choose to do it anonymously, but you chose to do it with your identity exposed. Why would you do that and become a crime offender?

Edward Snowden: I didn't hide my identity because I would sacrifice everything including my job and my personal life just to convey the truth to the public. The U.S. government is secretly constructing a gigantic monitoring network to intrude on people's privacy, and deprive them of the Internet and personal freedom. I really couldn't live with myself after I accidentally came across the secret. I never meant to do harm to people or the country; instead, uncovering the truth was my purpose.

68. What is the topic of the interview?

- (A) Glenn Greenwald's comment on Edward Snowden's behavior.
 (B) Edward Snowden's account for his decision.
 (C) The secret actions of NSA
 (D) The details of the PRISM program.
