Teenager

Me — a teenager?
 If she suddenly stood, here, now, before me,
 would I need to treat her as near and dear, although she's strange to me, and distant?

Shed a tear, kiss her forehead for the simple reason that we share a birthdate?

So many dissimilarities between us that only the bones are likely still the same, the cranial vault, the eye sockets.

Since her eyes seem a little larger,
 her eyelashes are longer, she's taller and the whole body is closely sheathed in smooth, unblemished skin.

Relatives and friends still link us, it is true, but in her world almost all are living, while in mine almost no one survives
 from that shared circle.

We differ so profoundly,
 talk and think about completely different things.
 She knows next to nothing — but with a doggedness deserving better causes.
 I know much more —
 but nothing for sure.

She shows me poems,
written in a clear and careful script that I haven't used for years.

I read the poems, read them.
Well, maybe that one
if it were shorter
and fixed in a couple of places.
The rest of it doesn't bode very well.

The conversation is heavy going.
On her pathetic watch
time is still cheap and unsteady.
On mine it's far more precious and precise.

Nothing for goodbye, a fixed smile and no emotion.
Only when she disappears leaving her scarf in her haste.

A scarf of genuine wool,
with colorful stripes
crocheted for her
by our mother.

I still have it with me.

--- Written by Wisława Szymborska, Translated by Clare Cavanagh & Stanisław Barańczak, from Here, Mariner Books.
