(I) In 1963, Martin Luther King, Jr. made his famous speech "I Have a Dream" in America's capital. The words Dr. King spoke to the crowd that day would 26 one of the most important and symbolic messages in the world. Dr. King's speech referenced the Emancipation Proclamation, which had freed slaves from 27 and formally ended the institution of slavery in the United States. Yet, Dr. King keenly observed that 28 black Americans may had been freed from their chains a hundred years earlier, they were still facing discrimination.

29 his point, Dr. King contrasted the poverty of blacks with the prosperity of whites. He used the image of a check—written in bad faith and not honored by the bank—as a metaphor to express his belief that America had failed to keep its promise to protect black people's rights. Specifically, Dr. King mentioned the rights to life, freedom, and happiness 30 belonged to everyone. Even though the United States may have defaulted on its promise to blacks, Dr. King told the crowd he had never given up his dream, which was for future generations to look beyond people's skin color and join hands with each other in a spirit of brotherhood. 31, the black might not have what they have now.

Throughout Europe, one kind of chicken reigns supreme. The Ross 308 is a breed developed specifically to grow rapidly—in just 35 days, it can be slaughtered and packaged for sale. However, animal welfare activists 46 the cruelty inherent in this factory-farming process, and have taken steps to change it. Their efforts in the UK have 47 a measure of success. Big names like KFC have agreed to 48 the Better Chicken Commitment.

Some entities have signed the international 49 aimed at eliminating the use of fast-growing breeds like the Ross 308. They will also monitor the welfare of the chickens they are 50 for and provide them with lower-density enclosures. Most chickens that people eat today are raised in 51, inhumane conditions. When these circumstances combine with breeding for rapid growth, the result is great suffering for the chicken 52. The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals found that they are more 53 to diseases and that they have much higher mortality rates when compared with slower-growing breeds.

Some might say that people cannot eat meat that comes from animals that are tortured so badly in the process of being raised. However, protein is an important nutrient, and the low cost of chicken makes this vital 54 to a healthy diet more accessible, as vegetarian or vegan diets are not the best option for everyone. The Better Chicken Commitment plans to 55 a good balance between compassion and pragmatism.

Taking responsibility for mistakes is a positive step, but don't beat yourself up about them. To err is human. 56. You can use the following writing exercise to help you do this.

In a journal or a piece of paper, put the heading "personal strengths." 57. Are you caring? Creative? Generous? A good listener? fun to be around? They don't have to be world-changing, just aspects of your personality that you are proud of.

At the top of second page, put the heading "acts of kindness." On this one, list the positive things you've done for others. it might be the time when you helped a friend with their homework, when you did an ironing without being asked, or when you baked cookies after family had had a tiring day. 58.

You could ask a friend or family member to have add to your list. 59. That way, you could exchange thoughts on what makes each of you special and the aspects of your personality that shines through. In fact, don't wait until you have mad mistake to try this -- that's a great way to boost self confidence at any time.

It's a something of the cliché that most people learn not from their success but their mistakes. the thing is, that is true. 60. We are all changing and learning all the time and mistakes all the positive way to develop and grow.

- (A) Yet, a little self-forgiveness goes a long way.
- (B) Now list all the characteristics you like about yourself.
- (C) They might even like to have a go at doing the exercise.
- (D) It's just as important to show yourself some forgiveness.
- (E) Whatever the mistakes, remember it isn't a fixed aspect of your personality.

(F) Whatever it is, no matter how small it might seem, write it down.

V. Reading Comprehension (12x2%=24%)

(Article 1) To clear Taiwan's dishonor of being a "living hell for pedestrians," the Ministry of Transportation and Communications has pulled out all the stops to ensure that drivers give right of way to pedestrians at intersections.

Although the legislation was established to create a more pedestrian-friendly environment, it has received unexpected criticism since its implementation. One of the biggest complaints is the "emperor complex" of pedestrians: No matter what they do, whether it be crossing on a red light or deliberately loitering on the crosswalk, drivers always have to give way to them or face a fine of NT$6,000.

"Pedestrians come first" is the iron rule in ensuring pedestrians' safety. However, as road traffic safety should be observed by pedestrians and drivers, it is not fair to establish legislation that favors pedestrians. A while ago, at the intersection of Fuxing N Road and Nanjing E Road, a man was reportedly "lost in reverie" on the crosswalk, preventing vehicles from turning right for up to 15 seconds, and people lambasted him for intentionally making a nuisance of himself.

Before traffic safety and mobility is improved at intersections, a better solution might be to make a clear distinction between pedestrian signals and right or left signals, so that pedestrians and drivers have guidance, as well as a benchmark for traffic contraventions. Otherwise, as long as there is a pedestrian on the crosswalk, all vehicles need to stop at a distance of at least 3m. Even when pedestrians cross on a red light, drivers still need to yield to them. This kind of overcorrection has caused people to question the purpose of traffic signals under such circumstances.

Feasibility, validity and impartiality are central to any legislation. Just as the idiom "If a prince violates the law, he must be punished like an ordinary person" underscores impartiality, it is unjust to mete out strict penalties to drivers who do not yield, and give pedestrians crossing on a red light a mere slap on the wrist. Accidents happen for many reasons, whether it be heavy traffic, badly designed intersections or vehicles breaking down, but the key still lies with drivers. Neglect, carelessness and speeding are all common reasons for accidents.

As a result, having drivers follow traffic rules and develop safe driving habits in a bid to ensure everyone's safety is the most important priority. Meting out heavy penalties treats the symptoms not the problem and causes unnecessary public anger. The ministry has of late been relying on enforcing the speed limit enforcement and traffic cameras to force drivers to adhere to the traffic safety rules, yet statistics show that there has been no reduction in the number of traffic casualties and accidents.

If the government wants people to follow traffic rules, it must first ensure that there is appropriate road planning, adequate parking spaces and a reasonable speed limit. However, by setting up speed cameras and traffic enforcement cameras, and conducting average speed enforcement the government is treating citizens like criminals. It is little wonder that citizens do not voluntarily observe traffic laws. In the Wanli period during China's Ming Dynasty, academic and official Lu Kun (呂坤) gave profound insight into the stringent laws made by the court. He said, to establish an unchanging law due to an occasional event, and to make the entire people suffer to punish one person's mistake is the root of the problem with a malignant law.

Given the government's overreliance on traffic enforcement cameras and the forced implementation of a problematic law, perhaps this insight hits closer to home than ever.

61. What is the main idea in the passage?

- (A) It is a propaganda about what government does to reset people's road culture.
- (B) It is a repetitive tune to remind people of the importance of not being fined.

- (B) The drivers drive too slowly to lead to drivers' getting hurt.
- (C) There are unclear signboard and horrible designed intersections.
- (D) Not giving enough attention to the things or people that are one's responsibility.

65. The author mentions elements to constitute a good law, and what element may be violated in the example : I went to a baseball game and I found out that the umpire was the uncle of a player on one of the teams.

- (A) feasibility (B) mobility (C) impartiality (D) validity

66. Why does the author in the last two paragraphs quotes LuKu's words?

- (A) To give an account of why roads in Taiwan are dangerous for pedestrians.
- (B) To encourage the government to rely more on the law enforcement since it is very useful.
- (C) To point out the flaws in the prejudiced law for it is unsuitable for all conditions.
- (D) To urge Taiwan's government to have more monitors set up in the roads.

(Article 2:)

How does an ecosystem work? What makes the population of different species the way they are? Why are there so many flies and so few wolves? To find an answer, scientists have built mathematical models of food webs, nothing who eats whom and how much each one eats.

With such models, scientists have found out some key principles operating in food webs. Most food webs, for instance, consist of many weak links rather than a few strong ones. When a predator always eats huge numbers of the single prey, the two species are strongly linked; when a predator lives on the various species, they are weakly linked. Food webs may be dominating by many weak links because that arrangement is more stable over the long term. If a predator can eat several species, it can survive the extinction of one of them. And if a predator can move on to another species that is easier to find when a prey species becomes rare, the switch allows the original prey to recover. The weak links may thus keep a species from driving one another to extinction.

mathematical models have also revealed that food webs may be unstable, where small changes of top predators can lead to big effects throughout entire ecosystems. In the 1960s, scientists proposed that predators at the top of the food web had a surprising amount of control over the size of populations of other species, including species they did not directly attack.

And unplanned human activities have proved that idea of top-down control by top predators to be true. In the ocean, we fished for top predators, such as cod on an industrial scale, while on land, we killed off large predators, such as wolves. These actions have greatly affected the ecological balance.

Scientists have built an early-warning system based on mathematical models. Ideally, the system would tell us when to adapt human activities that are pushing an ecosystem toward a breakdown or would even allow us to put an ecosystem back from borderline. prevention is key, scientists says because once ecosystems pass their tipping point, it is remarkably difficult for them to return.

67. What have scientists discovered with the help of the mathematical models of food webs?

- (A) The living habits of species in food webs
- (B) The rules governing food webs of the ecosystems.
- (C) The approaches to studying the species in the ecosystems.
- (D) The difference between weak and strong links in food webs.

68. A strong link is found between two species when a predator _____

- (A) has a wide food choice
- (B) can easily find new prey

- (C) sticks to one prey species (D) can quickly move to another place
69. What will happen if the populations of top predators in food webs greatly decline?
- (A) The prey species they directly attacked will die out.
 (B) The species they indirectly attack will turn into top predators.
 (C) The living environment of other species will remain unchanged.
 (D) The populations of other species will experience unexpected changes.
70. What conclusion can be drawn from the examples in paragraph 4?
- (A) Uncontrolled the human activities greatly upset ecosystems.
 (B) Rapid economic development threatens animal habitats.
 (C) Species of commercial value dominates other species.
 (D) Industrial activities help keep food webs stable.
71. How does an early-warning system help us maintain the ecological balance?
- (A) By getting illegal practices under control
 (B) By stopping us from killing large predators.
 (C) By bringing the broken-down ecosystems back to normal.
 (D) By signal the urgent need for taking preventive action.

- [1] Guan—Gaun Guan,53, took a prudent path to a successful career. Armed with an M.B.A, he started with a local investment bank before moving to an international corporate bank, where he rose to the executive director.
- [2] For the past decade, he had had a lucrative career and had his high point earned 2 million dollars a year in a salary and bonuses. He also taught business courses at a local community college, lived in the luxurious apartment in the up-scale mid-levels and drove a Mercedes, Martin and Lamborghini.
- [3] Then, he lost everything. This stable life came undone when his two children left home for college and his wife asked for divorce.
- [4] “We’d just grown apart during the years I worked day in and day out, my wife apparently lived a different opinion on almost anything,” Guan said. “It happened that she had a grown independent of me since I was away from home most of the time for work.” Just two months later, Guan gave his wife what he wanted, hoping that would at least make her happy.
- [5] Not long after the heartbreaking divorce, Guan lost something else-- his job. His company shut down the number of departments and laid off a handle of top management because of the plunging economy. Still, Guan should not to be worried. And, in fact, he was not. He got a huge severance package and thought he could just take some time off and then look for another job when he was ready to enter the battlefield again.
- [6] “It seemed like the perfect time for me to fix my private life and start all over again,” Guan said. He packed his bags and traveled around the world by himself and spent the days a nice trying to figure out what went wrong between him his wife and went out how he was going to improve the relationship with his sons who has already gone to boarding school in England by then.

- [7] The last thing that worried Guan was his job. He is well regarded figure in his field. His former colleagues and supervisors call him “an asset to any organization.” He is equipped with years of invaluable experience about the banking industry and then dean of the college where he teaches describes him as “a dedicated professional.”
- [8] Unfortunately, none of this matters in the recessive economy. After a long three-month vacation, Guan started his job hunt with his head held up high. But after applying for more than 50 jobs, he had just two intervals—one of which over the phone. At the only in-person interview that he got, he was asked to about the expected salary. Knowing the difficult s situation in the job market, Guan slashed his last salary by half.
- [9] “It was like saying: whatever you’re paying, I’ll take it,” Guan said. He understood that it was different world now and thought that he could adapt. The question is, it was not up to him. In the end, the job went to someone half his age. After he lost his job, Guan bought two killer suits ready to take on the business world soon again. He had never worn any of them.
- [10] Being single and jobless, Joe moves to the studio apartment in a country because rents are cheaper, but more importantly, because it is farther away from the city, he could easily walk to a grocery store before, but now he has to drive at least 20 minutes to get to the decent one and he likes it.
- [11] “If everything is near like it used to be before, I’m back from my grocery shopping in 15 minutes and then what?” Joe has enough to live on for a few more years and he knows he is one of the lucky few. Still, he wakes in the midnight, scared of not being able to find a job, scared of not knowing what to do for the rest of his life.
- [13] “The world around me changed. Now, things are like they could be here one day and then gone the next,” Guan said. He has come to know a lot of professionals in the industry over the years, but few to network with at this time. Eighty percent of the people he has known from work lost their jobs just like him.
- [14] He has put together a few decent portfolios and a CV by companies insisted that he sent in his application by email the companies sell them acknowledge you receiving his applications let alone telling him that he was rejected.
- [15] “There were no letters, no courtesy, but rudeness and the distressed but disrespect now.”Guan exclaimed. Several factors are at play: an increasing number of people are out of work, the labor market has contracted and the companies are downsizing to cut costs.
- [16] Taking away the money factor, psychologists are saying that people out of work are more likely to suffer from depression because the sudden lost their self-esteem. Like Guan, employees used to be somebody else when they had a job. But once they lost it, everything ground to the halt. They could feel loss with no sense of purpose there was no sense of purpose of self esteem. Days are difficult for Guan because filling the time seems like a chore. He forces himself to eat out every day just to get out and be around people. A few times a week, he rides the train to the city just to kill time.
- [17] Sometimes he feels better and manages to persuade himself that there is so much else to do other than work. He can work in charities, or even start his business. But for Guan who has worked most of his life, the dilemma of being too old to find a job but too young to retire always reminds deep in his heart
